

GUSTAVE DIDELOT

From the disturbing fantasy to the fleshy layout of self-mockery, Gustave Doré took “what makes him feel good”. This is perhaps what he postulates: a better world to which we must never stop. Let’s welcome it, let’s celebrate it, at least for the time of a look.

Three points and a bar. This arrangement is omnipresent, placed on everything that would like to be face. A face that is never one, not even a sketch. Rather an element of language, like a segment of the Morse alphabet, adorning everything that is intended to come to life in this World of Painting.

Gustave Doré’s gesture remains inseparable from the creation of a territory, imagined in reality, lived in fiction.

A territory in perpetual expansion. Carried by a dialectical tension between contradictory signs: the bristles of the brushes abdicate their softness to ignite or flank themselves with axes; spectral shapes rub shoulders with lovers who embrace; sugar characters—gingerbread men and honey-man—slow down under their own inoffensiveness.

But the telluric describes ambition: no territory without land, and to make it visible, we must push back the horizon lines to the top of the frame. (Ex) posing his canvases on the floor. painting sands moving, which the artist invites us to tread on to submerge in Painting. The immersive universe is the avowed objective of Gustave Doré. Himself a gamer, his painting seems to be a link between the surrealistic inspiration and the visual charter of the video game.
